"This is our strongest season yet," said Christina Hartman, vice president and head of Scripps News. "From conflict and climate change to technology, A.I. and pop culture, Season 6 of 'In Real Life' represents some of the best reporting, cinematography and storytelling in video news."

The hourlong premiere features the work of Peabody and Emmy award-winning correspondent Sebastian Walker (VICE News, AI Jazeera) and uses on-the-ground reporting and satellite imagery analysis of the West Bank, Israel, to show how a war in response to terror is turning into a renewed conflict over settlements.

Spending time with Israeli settler movements, a Palestinian fighter group and a wide range of voices representative of real life in the region, the "In Real Life" team sheds light on the shifting frontlines of the conflict in the one-hour episode, culminating in a revealing interview with a high-ranking official in Israel's government. Faced with limited international media access into Gaza, the documentary features satellite imagery analysis from Scripps News and its partners at Bellingcat, the investigative journalism group that specializes in open-source reporting. It also features reporting from within Gaza, with scenes captured by a local filmmaker caught in the middle of an unfolding humanitarian crisis. For this episode, Walker worked with former VICE News colleagues including Adam Desiderio (producer), Lama Al-Arian (producer), Jeb Banegas (editor) and Javier Manzano (director of photography), along with the "In Real Life" team behind its past award-winning seasons, including Zach Toombs (executive producer), Hailey Gavin (editor), Jake Godin (producer) and Jennifer Smart (animator).

"We've taken the immersive storytelling of our 'In Real Life' series up a notch this season by adding many excellent journalists from VICE News and across the industry," said Toombs, executive producer of "In Real Life" and director of longform at Scripps News. "Each episode digs into critical issues facing the world, at home and abroad, where traditional media may not be able to do these deeper dives."
